

‘Alan Spence’s new book is a very welcome addition to the literature on the doctrine of atonement. It is welcome because Spence has the courage to argue against the recent consensus, and to try to push behind the many different metaphors or models of salvation to find a grand unified theory that will ground and interpret them all. More than that, however, any book so well written will gain a heartfelt welcome from scholars so used to wading through impenetrable prose. With the style and urgency of a true preacher, and the knowledge and insight of a true scholar, Spence offers us a book of genuine interest and worth.’

Steve Holmes, Lecturer in Theology, St Mary’s College, St Andrews, Scotland

‘Alan Spence advocates and practises a no-nonsense approach to Christian theology: clear, accessible, passionate, not afraid of controversy, but always pastoral, and, above all, eager to be faithful to the Christian gospel. Even those who do not agree with his conclusions will enjoy engaging in conversation with him.’

Christoph Schwöbel, Professor of Systematic Theology, University of Tübingen, Germany

‘A very clearly argued and well written book that sets out to develop an account of the atonement that is faithful to the biblical record and that tries to overcome perceived difficulties within the theological tradition.’

Murray Rae, Senior Lecturer in Theology, University of Otago, New Zealand

‘Seasoned by years on the front lines of ministry, both in missions and human rights work, the author’s profound insights into the logic of redemption bear a sense of urgency and pastoral depth. The Promise of Peace is not simply another summary of Christian doctrine; it is a judicious and passionate – at times even polemical – defence of the heart of the gospel for our time.’

Michael Horton, Professor of Systematic Theology and Apologetics, Westminster Seminary, California, USA
